

As a consumer, I expect unfettered access to the marketplace. I should have the freedom to seek the products I choose because I choose to consume or sell those which I choose to sell. This access should not be based on what access I can afford to pay, but merely be available because of the foundational principles of a free marketplace. The Internet IS a public utility by which we function economically and educationally. For this reason, it is absurd to think that it can be treated differently as access to electricity or water.
